

ALLIES ARE DRIVING
ENEMY FROM AIRAttrition of German Service
Has Been Relentlessly Continued for Months.

(By Lieut.-Col. Ringen.)
(Copyright, 1918, by New York World.)
London.—The Germans are putting up a stiff defense on the Vesle, but they cannot be inordinately happy there with the Aisne behind them and the allied armies busy with the bridges across it. The peninsula between the rivers will soon be swept in all its parts when the allied artillery is up, and on the Rheims side the French are already beyond the Vesle and able to make their presence felt.

Meanwhile, at dawn yesterday, Field Marshal Haig led out the French and British army on the Aisne front and the main interest for the next few days is transferred to this quarter. It will be noticed in the British communiqué of Aug. 6 that a few hostile airplanes were seen in the air on the previous day and that there was no air fighting. The attrition of the German air service has been relentlessly continued for many months and there is no subject on which German reports have led more shamelessly.

We are on the way to supremacy in the air and, though we shall not win the war by means of it, no subject can give the German command, in every sense, more sleepless nights.

Beaten in the Open.
The Germans often told us how they would beat us in the open field when trench fighting was ended. For the last three weeks they have had an opportunity of making good their boast and have not done so. All they seek just now is a good place to place between themselves and the destruction of their bridges. This is not seeking the open field, but rather seeking to avoid it.

Again, the hiring German press, acting under orders, first said there were no Americans worth counting on, and, secondly, that the American army was inferior to militia. It has proved good enough to whip the Germans both in trench warfare and in open fighting, while the news from America that there will be 3,000,000 Americans in the field next year will create a very disagreeable impression throughout the German army and among the German people.

The French government have not awaited the Gamblett moment to make Poch a marshal, and they have done well, for no one better deserves the honor. To him belong the main responsibility and decision, and congratulations from all the allies will be showered upon him. Not less is our debt to Gen. Petain, who planned and executed, through his intrepid subordinates, this masterly second battle of the Marne. To him falls the "Medaille Militaire," the most characteristic of the highest French decorations, since it is usually borne by privates only. Not more than four or five French generals, I believe, possess it.

Masterly Generalship.
One cannot give greater praise to this second battle of the Marne than to say it is worthy of Joffre's first battle of the same name. The exemplary patience with which the French command waited until the superior enemy committed a folly, the assurance with which it allowed the enemy to commit himself before striking back, the admirable dispositions of Gen. Gouraud's army, on the success of which all depended, the coolness with which the German passage of the Marne was received, the steadiness of Gen. Berthelot's French, Italian and British on the Montagne-de-Reims, which was an indispensable part of the whole scheme, and, finally, the concealed concentration, the rapid deployment and the fierce onslaught of the Franco-American armies, are all masterly examples of generalship and show us once more that old principles hold good and that war is indeed art and not science. We rejoice deeply that French leadership has conspicuously proved its superiority to the German. That after four years of hard and bitter war, French and Italian troops are capable of seconding good generalship with their valor, and last, but not least, that our gallant American comrades should have imperishably entwined their names in the story of a battle which will live forever in the annals of history. It is an act of a drama not finished. The villain of the piece yet survives.

Checking Ludendorff.
Imagine Ludendorff planning his revenge under cover of his rear guards and redistributing his troops for the purpose. He has shortened his line, but so has Poch. Redistribution need not be all on one side. It is partly due to these considerations that Haig with the First French and Fourth British armies has been placed in motion on the Aisne front, and has thus forestalled the intentions of the enemy.

For a considerable time the British and French between Albert and Montdidier had been steadily improving their position by a series of minor operations the general result of which has been to place them in better position for delivering the attack.
